

Since the inception of the Do Not Call law in New Jersey, our phone calls from telemarketers has decreased by 75%. Being a working parent, my time at home is very important to me. When I arrive home from work, there is dinner to be made, homework to be done and time needed just to talk as a family. The constant calls from telemarketers is annoying and disruptive and from experience, a great deal of these telemarketers are rude and will not take no for an answer. I have found that even with the calls I am still receiving, I automatically say "I do not donate or purchase anything over the telephone" and then I have to hang up on the person. I feel that if I want to purchase something or donate something, I will do so without receiving the calls. I think that especially with the scams going on in the world today, telemarketing should either be monitored much more closely than it is or it should be eliminated all together.
